“ The prevailing theme in my current body of work deals with absence and presence, subject and object and their transformation through performance. I use elements such as concentration, breath, tension and duration to reflect this research in my oeuvre. Knitting, installation, video and sound are some of the mediums I have used to record my current investigations. ”

TLHOGO

In Tlhogo, a good amount of time was spent on the pre-performance preparations which involved crocheting a suit out of hand-spun wool from different origins. The woollen sleeve was created specifically to fit the body, leaving just enough space to enter it. The performance is placed on a plinth situated in a white cube environment. It starts with struggling into the woollen cover. The performance continues with the entrance being closed by crocheting it from the inside. Once it is closed the viewer is unable to assert which side is up and which down, for the next two and a half hours the performer is exposed as a living object. Though at first glance the viewer is unable to tell that the object on the plinth is alive, only on close inspection does one notice movement from breathing. This is due to the lack of body adjustments — only three times in duration. The change in position is designed to relieve the body and create a different sculptural image.

The performance ends with the performer liberating herself out of the woollen cover. The remains (or the performance relic) are what's left behind.
